PRESS RELEASE

Time to act to protect Cornish hedges

Cornish hedges provide vital refuge for many of Cornwall's native species. Without them many animal species; birds, beetles, bats, bees, moths and butterflies and small mammals, would not exist.

It is time to act state Cornwall Wildlife Trust who are aiming to raise £20,000 to carry out vital work to protect the county's iconic hedges.

An estimated 30,000 miles of hedges criss-cross Cornwall, but Cornish Hedges are not protected by the national Hedgerow Regulations (1997) and are therefore threatened by removal and neglect. Development, road building schemes and implementation of utility services has taken its toll. Drift of fertiliser, pesticide and herbicide used in adjoining fields has led to loss of biodiversity.

These iconic structures not only form a sanctuary for many animal species, nearly 200 flowering plant species have been counted in just one mile of an ordinary roadside hedge. An estimated 10,000 species of insects can be supported by the floral and habitat diversity in Cornwall's hedges. This in turn attracts mammals such as dormice and hedgehogs, birds like the song thrush, and reptiles to forage and to hide their homes and nests in the greenery and in stony crevices.

As well as being a valuable habitat in their own right, well-managed hedges act as a network across which wildlife can move between fragmented semi-natural habitats. Hedgerows also prevent soil erosion, capture pollutants such as fertilisers and pesticides running off fields, store carbon to help combat climate change, and provide homes for predators of many pest species.

Ruediger Wohlers, Cornish Bard, Friend of Hedges and long term supporter of Cornwall Wildlife Trust says,

“Cornwall’s hedgerows are corridors for wildlife that connect habitat; they are home to the badger, the butterfly, the gorse and red campion amongst many. They are part of Cornwall’s character and charm and attract people from all over the world. We must keep these hedgerows thriving for future generations, a challenge for us all!”

The iconic Cornish hedge is found all over Cornwall forming field boundaries and road verges; it is a defining feature of the Cornish landscape and many hedges date back to the Bronze Age. It represents a wealth of diversity both in its function and in its style of construction, ranging from the classic form with an earth-cored bank faced in local stone, often with a row of shrubs and trees, to dry stone walls.

The Trust will act in a number of ways, including:

- Carry out hedge surveys where mapping of Cornish hedges will provide an accurate picture of hedge resource across the whole county. This will give the necessary evidence to inform and influence individuals, communities, farmers and local government and decision makers, as well as lobbying for legal protection.
- Carry out practical work on their nature reserves. At Bartinney and Caer Bran Nature Reserves the Trust will carry out stone faced Cornish Hedge work and introduce two new granite stiles, while at Helman Tor and Prideaux Wood Nature Reserve hedge restoration work will be carried out.
- Raise awareness of Cornish hedges. The Trust will host a workshop promoting the importance of Cornish hedges and assessing the ecological, historical and cultural value of a hedge within the landscape.
- Create Fox Club events so local children can be made aware of the importance of hedges within the landscape both now and in the future.
